Many Greeks losing homes

Greek Prime Minister Alexis Tsipras released a harshly worded statement that accused creditors of "pillaging" his country. On Friday, Tsipras visited Russia and said that his country is "not hesitating to new seas and regimes" to attain a broader perspective.

To pre-qualify for this study, you must be:
- Between 18 and 75 years of age
- Diagnosed with uncontrolled high blood pressure and type 2 diabetes
- On stable doses of at least two medicines for high blood pressure for at least 30 days and on a stable dose of metformin and/or glipizide for the past 60 days.

To learn more, please contact:
ORTHOCENTRE RESEARCH CENTER
www.OCResearchCenter.com
988-470-5311

A HOMELESS MAN reads a newspaper in Athens. Some say the number of homeless as high as 20,000. Greece's unemployment rate is 29%, the EU's highest.

What we're seeing is the wiping out of a lower-middle class, or a former lower-middle class. -- Roman Gerodimos, a reporter on modern Greek society at Bournemouth University.

Instead, municipalities and community groups have ransacked kitchens and shelters for what's left, and townspeople, like many others, have been left with little to eat.

The home of Europe's rich and famous has been left in disrepair, as the Greek government has not provided the safety net its citizens once relied on. In many places, the government has reduced benefits and social services, leaving people to fend for themselves.

How to contact us:
(800) LA TIMES

2 Brazilian executives arrested in graft inquiry